*ABSTRACT

In humanities papers, both DAROU and NODE-WANAIKA are frequently used to express writers' suppositions and assertions. Since lots of similarities lie in semantic usages of both forms, it is difficult for learners to distinguish the differences when writing academic papers. Therefore, we study and compare the actual usages of DAROU and NODEWANAIKA in humanities papers in order to improve learners' writing guidance. The usages of DAROU and NODEWANAIKA are consisted of "presumption" and "euphemism", and differences between them in the introduction, main theme, and conclusion of papers are pointed out with specific examples in this paper. Also views of improving academic writing guidance are presented.
